

MAN launches special internal investigation

Munich, May 6, 2009

MAN today launched a special internal investigation into commission payments at MAN Nutzfahrzeuge AG. External experts are supporting the company's Corporate Audit department in its endeavors. The aim of the investigation is to help completely clear up the allegations and to reveal any potential misconduct by individual employees. The Corporate Audit department's findings will be made available to the investigating authorities.

Commission payments are permissible in principle if used to compensate actual performance. According to the public prosecution office, however, there are grounds to suspect that the relevant regulations in force were breached when commission payments were paid between 2002 and 2005. This matter must now be clarified. MAN is cooperating closely with the public prosecution office.

Compulsory conduct guidelines and clear rules that have been further developed in recent years apply to all employees at MAN. They forbid MAN Group employees from conferring benefits of any kind with the aim of obtaining orders or unfair advantages for MAN or other persons. In addition, MAN's compliance system includes a compliance officer and a steering committee tasked with enforcing the rules, a compliance hotline and two external ombudspersons who employees can also contact anonymously.
